MR. POWELL,

Please to insert the following QUERIES in your next Paper, and you will oblige, A CONSTANT READER.

USEFUL QUERIES.

I. IS not GOD inconceivably glorious and excellent, and infinitely worthy to be loved?

II. Are not Devils, notwithstanding they are abandoned to all the Horrors of Perdition, bound to love him?

III. Is not the transcendant Excellency and Amiableness of the Divine Nature, the Ground of this Obligation?

IV. Can GOD's not loving them, so as to redeem them from the dreadful Ruins of their Apostacy, be supposed in the least to excuse their horrid Enmity and Opposition against him?

V. Is not every unregenerate Man, though possest with the malignant Temper of a Devil, bound to love GOD supremely?

VI. Can any Interest in the Divine Favour, from which he is entirely excluded, be possibly supposed to constitute this Obligation?

VII. Is not every true Christian, by a spiritual Change or Renovation of Soul, enabled to see the glorious Excellency and Amiableness of the Divine Being?

VIII. Is not this Sight, this enlightened View of the Godhead, the only Foundation of all true, genuine Love, in the Christian?

IX. Is not this the best Criterion, by which a Christian can judge of the Truth and Reality of his State?

X. Are not they greatly mistaken then, who assert, that true Love to God is not founded on an Apprehension of the Divine Glory and Excellency, but on a probable Conjecture that he loves them?

XI. May not that Love which springs from such a Source, be suspected as vain, mercenary, and selfish?

XII. Will it not follow from hence, that no Man is obliged to love GOD, until he is perswaded some Way or other, that GOD loves him?

XIII. Is not such a blasphemous Consequence enough to damn that Doctrine, from which it naturally flows?

CHALES-TOWN: Printed by T. POWELL & Comp. at the Printing-Office near the EXCHANGE.

DISCOURSE on the pernicious Tendency of falſe and ſcandalous Reports. [Continued from our laſt.]

A MAN of worth will never fall into the horrible plague of reporting to theſe, who are angry againſt others, the words of animoſity which theſe might have ſaid againſt them; and he will abide without trouble with this maxim, That it is not enough for a man truly charitable, not to excite or augment, by his reports, the enmities of men, but that he ought alſo to labour with his whole ſtrength to extinguiſh and ſtifle them. A man, by following this rule, avoids one part of the faults which he commits in relating indiſcreetly what he only knows from ſome particular words ſpoken: But this is not the only fault he is obliged to be careful of in this reſpect. That of believing lightly the faults which others tell us, is of no leſs importance, and may be ſaid to be ſtill more dangerous, becauſe we are leſs watchful on that ſide, and ſuffer ourſelves the more eaſily to be inſnared from an appearance of having no concern in the matter. We fancy that the relater alone is reſponſible for his aſperſions, or that we may rely on him for the truth of the fact related. In the mean time it is quite otherwiſe with us; for the ſoul of the man who hearkneth, remains not without action; ſhe thinketh, judgeth, followeth her paſſions, acteth alſo oftentimes in following her paſſions, and, if ſhe has not had cauſe to credit theſe reports, of courſe thoſe judgments are falſe, thoſe paſſions unjuſt, and thoſe actions diſorderly.

To comprehend, as to this point, the injuſtice and perverſeneſs of moſt minds, we need only conſider, that when men are diſtinguiſhed by a certain garb, which the decorum of life has aſſigned to judges, and being aſſembled in a certain place where things are propoſed and treated in certain forms and methods, they act commonly in a diſcreet, wiſe, and equitable manner. The ſpeeches of one party make no impreſſion in their mind, till they know what the adverſe party have to offer in anſwer. They examine ſcrupulouſly the proofs; they reject ſuch as are falſe and uncertain; they give leave to weaken the depoſition of witneſſes by croſs examinations, and they never declare a man guilty of a crime imputed to him, unleſs abſolutely convicted of it. The ſole defect of proofs is a cogent motive to acquit the accuſed, and they would condemn themſelves of temerity and injuſtice, if they did not punctually adhere to theſe forms. But when men, diveſted of ſuch power and authority, exerciſe private judgments, their behaviour is quite the reverſe. All proofs ſuffice them, every allegation ſerves their turn; every witneſs is kindly received, and upon the bare information of perſons, either prejudiced or knowing little of the matter, or prevaricating, or without judgment, they will declare, without heſitation, people guilty of all that the others chuſe to lay to their charge.

Perhaps it may be ſaid that it is impoſſible to uſe in private judgments all the formalities of the public; but, if men obſerve not the garb and the ſolemnity, they ought at leaſt to obſerve what is neceſſary to be aſſured of the truth. What a paſſionate, inconſiderate, and inconſiſtent witneſs reports of words ſpoken, deſerves no more belief than one of the ſame ſtamp before a judge, and even leſs, becauſe here an oath taken makes it to be ſuppoſed that honour, conſcience, and fear of puniſhment will utter no falſehood. A falſe and uncertain proof is abſolutely falſe and uncertain; yet thoſe, who would make a conſcience of judging upon the bench, on proofs and witneſſes of this nature, make none at all frequently of condemning people in particular upon very weak proofs and witneſſes.

There is indeed nothing more unreaſonable than this unequal dealing; but it has a very effective cauſe in the corruption of hearts. If ſome equity is ſhewn in public judgments, it is not becauſe men really love juſtice; they would love it every-where if they loved it truly; but it is becauſe the form to which they are bound hinders them from going aſide. There is nothing of this in private judgments on ſcandalous and malicious reports. There neither is form obſerved, not infamy to be feared. We are at full liberty to follow the propenſity of nature, we follow it, and this propenſity carries us to receive, without examination, all that has been related to a neighbour's diſadvantage; becauſe we naturally love to ſcoff at others, to ſcorn them, and ſee them humbled; and on the contrary we loathe attention, reſervedneſs, and ſuſpenſion of judgment, which has always ſomething tormenting and laborious, and makes us rather judge at hazard and by ſurmiſe, than take pains to judge well.

Let us therefore be carful that our paſſions go no further than our ſight, and let us minutely conſider all reports, that we may not give them more ſubſtance and reality than they have. For oftentimes giving them a being which they have not, and making them ſubſiſt by our imagination, when they are annihilated in that of others, we muſt not believe that men, converſant with more important and ſolid objects, are of an humour to amuſe themſelves for any time with reports noiſed abroad without ground. All theſe humours have only a tranſitory currency, and having ſerved for topics of diſcourſe, for ſome days, to idle and indolent perſons, are diſſipated and vaniſh away when they are weary of ſpeaking and talking of them. We have nothing to do but let them paſs, and ſlight them as vain whims, of which nothing remains. Though they might ſubſiſt for a long time, and make a very durable impreſſion, we muſt pity the retainers of it, as more hurtful to them than ourſelves.

We ſhould not only endeavour to guard againſt the evils of impatience and reſentment, falſe and ſcandalous reports may hurry us into; but alſo attempt to make them of effectual utility, which they would undoubtedly, if we knew how to profit by inſtructions, we might draw from them. For what can teach us better the vanity of what men call reputation, than the inconſtancy which moſt people ſhew upon thoſe occaſions? How ſubſtantial ſoever the proofs may be, a man has given of integrity or ſound judgment, we ſhall not be the leſs ready to hearken with pleaſure to a ridiculous ſtory, and without any juſt foundation, which it may pleaſe any one to make of him. The world is naturally ſo wicked, that it always ſeconds thoſe who will deſtroy another's reputation; and, if it has ſometimes an eſteem for certain people, it is in ſome ſort againſt its will and in ſpite of it; ſo that the world is always glad to get rid of this eſteem, as of a thing that incommodes it. What then is more ridiculous than to feed this vain ſmoke, and make it the end of our actions and labours?

It being neceſſary that the good things of this world ſhould be intermingled with bitterneſs, that we might not place too great an affection on them, we ought not to be ſurprized that the familiar converſation, kept up among us, ſhould alſo have its diſguſts. We receive from it a multiplicity of ſenſible and inſenſible wounds; virtue is often quite ruined by it, and we catch the contagion of all the corruption that is ſpread into a diverſity of minds. Whatever then may incite us to ſequeſter ourſelves in more ſolitude, and to hold communication with a few only, may be of ſingular advantage to us. Nothing is more capable to make us loathe the tumultuous commerce of life, than our finding ſo little honeſty and faith in moſt people, and learning by experience how much it is neceſſary to be upon our guard when we are to treat with thoſe we have but a ſlender acquaintance with. It may likewiſe be ſaid, that it is a happineſs to be freed from an ill-conditioned ſpirit, which is capable of abuſing what is told it; and that we ought to eſteem ourſelves happy, when, alarmed by ſome indiſcreet report raiſed of us, we can ſay to ourſelves, our commerce with the world is reduced to a mere neceſſity.

The commerce, however, ſhould not be ſo curtailed, as to break with our friends, when we have cauſe to impute ſome indiſcretion to them, for we muſt ſuffer in them this fault as in others. But it ought to be a warning to us to behave ourſelves with more circumſpection; and, by this means, ſuch as may not be ſo truſty nor faithful, will often be the more uſeful, by obliging us to be the more cautious of our words, and to avoid all that may give occaſion to their being abuſed.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 20.

Wedneſday evening arrived here in 23 days from the Bay, the ſnow Eaſher, Capt. Dann, bound to Boſton, but put in here being in want of proviſions. He reports that there are about 20 of the moſt diſperate of the negroes ſtill in arms; that five who where taken were executed in the following manner, viz. One hanged, three burnt, and one gibbeted alive. That their plan (which was laid with ſuch art as to give it a probability of ſucceſs) was to have murdered every white perſon and their adherents; but the full execution of it was happily prevented by the confeſſion of one of the Conſpirators who had been taken—that ſince the beginning of the inſurrection, they had murdered about 20 white people—that a man of war was arrived there from Jamaica, and they had ſent for another to protect them—that they were in great want of proviſions and none to be had, the trade being intirely at an end. No Logwood or Mahogany cut this year, and what had been left of what was cut before, waſhed away with the floods. That in ſix weeks upwards of 40 negroes had gone over to the Spaniards, who protected and refuſed to deliver them up; and 20 more in one gang, went off juſt before he left the Bay: That moſt of the white people were preparing to leave it, with their negroes and effects, ſome of them intending to ſettle in Georgia, being very apprehenſive the Spaniards would come down upon them, and make reprifals for the Salvige of the Spaniſh regiter ſhip Thetis, which had been loſt at the Bay ſome time ago, as mentioned in the papers. He left only two veſſels there, one of which, a brig belonging to Philadelphia, Capt. John Eves, was to ſail for Georgia, with Negroes, &c. in about ten days after Capt Dann.
